Paris has been struck by a series of train attacks just hours before the opening ceremony of the 2024 Olympic Games, leading to significant disruptions and heightened security concerns, according reports.

French intelligence is investigating potential links to far-left or environmentalist protesters, citing the methods used in the attacks as resembling those of such radical groups. However, there are also fears that Russia could be involved.

The coordinated arson attacks targeted key rail facilities across the country, bringing train services to a halt and affecting around 800,000 passengers, including athletes and spectators heading to the Games. Fires were reported at strategic points in the network, suggesting that the perpetrators had detailed knowledge of the infrastructure.

With the grand opening ceremony set to take place along the River Seine later today, French authorities are working urgently to manage the fallout from the attacks. Despite the ongoing investigation, no claim of responsibility has been made, and officials have yet to officially name any suspects. Security measures across the city have been intensified to ensure the safety of the event and its attendees.
