

Forget regional diplomacy and standard military protocol; Uganda's Chief of Defence Forces, General Muhoozi Kainerugaba, has pivoted to a much more pressing matter: his rightful place in the Hellenistic lineage.

In a series of late-night posts on X that sent historians into a tailspin and social media into a frenzy, the General announced that a DNA test has revealed he is 14% Greek.

Not one to settle for a mundane ancestry, Muhoozi immediately claimed kinship with Alexander the Great, presumably because they both share a fondness for territorial expansion and tactical tweeting.

RECENTLY, I CHECKED MY DNA. APPARENTLY, I'M 14% GREEK? I ALWAYS KNEW I WAS RELATED TO ALEXANDER THE GREAT. I'M GOING TO VISIT GREECE AND I HOPE THEY WON'T ASK ME FOR A VISA.

— MUHOOZI KAINERUGABA (@MKAINERUGABA) APRIL 29, 2026

The announcement that Uganda's army chief traces Greek roots came during a broader string of provocative posts.

The "First Son" didn't stop at historical claims. He signaled his intent to "return" to his ancestral home, albeit with a unique approach to international travel:

"I'm going to visit Greece and I hope they won't ask me for a visa," Muhoozi posted, presumably banking on the fact that Greek immigration officers are well-versed in the "Do You Know Who My Great-Great-Great-(x50)-Grandfather Is?" defense.

Muhoozi's Greek revelation comes on the heels of a rather unorthodox diplomatic spat with Turkey. Earlier this month, the General allegedly:

- Demanded $1 billion from Ankara.
- Requested the "most beautiful woman in the country" as a bride.
- Claimed recently to have married five Turkish women, effectively turning foreign policy into a high-stakes dating show.

He followed this up with a stern warning: if Turkey threatens him or Uganda again, there will be a "serious fight." Whether this fight will involve phalanges, hoplites, or just more emojis remains to be seen.

Perhaps most startling is the General's proposed immigration reform. Moving away from standard biometric passports, Muhoozi suggested a more... aesthetic vetting process.

He stated that Uganda would begin barring entry to people who are short, have large noses, or lack "nyashes" (slang for a certain posterior curvature). It's a bold move that replaces traditional border security with what can only be described as a "Physical Fitness and Vibes" check.

Between raising 1 billion Shillings for his 52nd birthday run and threatening to seize Nairobi in under a fortnight (a claim that got him reshuffled in 2022), Muhoozi is now setting his sights on the 2026 Presidency, according to political observers.

The Editorial Take: If the DNA results are true, the world should prepare itself. Alexander the Great conquered the known world by age 30; Muhoozi is starting at 52, but he has the advantage of 4G internet and a seemingly infinite supply of Turkish brides.

Greece, you've been warned: The heir is coming home, and he's probably bringing a military convoy and a very specific list of physical requirements for your tourists.